THE MODEL TRAMP.

BY THE EDITOR.

It was on the morning of the day of publication. One of the compositors was sick and the paper was greatly behind. I was very auxious to get it out at the regular time, but could obtain no help for love or money. I was trying to devise some plan to extricate myself from the unpleasant dilemma when the door opened and a representative of that ambulatory class of individuals known as tramps entered. He was a forlors looking specimen. His clothes were ragged and his teatures almost obscured with dirt and fith. He was short of statue, face full and florid, not, however, betokening dishe was but a boy, not more than twenty years of age. He came in with a cautious step and with an uneasy glance around the room, as if expecting to be kicked out, and meckly asked,

"Is the editor in ?" "He is," said I, stepping forward. What can I do for you?"

"I want work, sir. I am a printer and I want something to do. I am far from home without money and friends, and am willing to work for anything. I have recommendations from my former employer at Macon, Gs., Read that."

I took the paper and read :

His ragged and dirty shirt had been replaced by the one I had given him, and he had been to the barber's shop and had his long red bair taken off and upon the whole presented a much more respectable appearance.

I gave him a situation and days and weeks passed and he grew more and more worthy in my estimation. He was industrious, moral and respectful. As fast as money was paid him he purchased necessary articles of wearing apparel, till his old ragged by new ones that made him look
